I am pretty sure that there are plenty of people here who are looking at the many libraries available.

I personally find that too many libraries focus on presentation and/or widgets, while IMHO, Ajax should be about the frontend<->backend communication. On the other hand; feedback must be provided, so we'd better use something nice, right?

The dojo library (<http://dojotoolkit.org/>) does provide a nice widget set with hooks to the backend using the bind function. This looks cool, however the total library (called the kitchen sink) is over 1Mb.

I tried to add some widgets using overlib (<http://www.bosrup.com/web/overlib/> and <http://overlib.boughner.us/>), the result can be found at the demo-site of my project: <http://www.brim-project.org/demo>

In the bookmarks section, you can add/modify a bookmark. Here you will find a favicon button which triggers an Ajax call, shows a popup and this popup gets disabled when the result is received from the backend.

This is a forum for developers, I guess many have tried something similar? What do you think about this solution?

By the way, favicons do not work in IE, so this functionality is disabled for IE. It works in Firefox (with fading popup), Konquerer and Opera (popup do not fade).
